The guidance was developed in co-operation with the Public Health Agency, with contributions from representatives of the statutory sector, relatives and independent healthcare providers. It sets out an agreed approach to supporting visiting in care homes.

The guidance sets out the expected approach to supporting safe and proportionate visiting in care homes. This includes arrangements for the safe management of care home residents receiving visitors, as well as residents being able to visit other households and community facilities, as well as taking part in excursions.

The arrangements set out the expectation for how visiting arrangements should be managed in a range of circumstances:

Normal Arrangements (no active outbreak in the care home):

There should be no restrictions on visiting

Care Home in Outbreak:

Even should the care home experience a localised outbreak, so long as the care home has capacity and visitors are aware of the ongoing situation there should be no restrictions on visiting. Appropriate dynamic risk assessment of the care home should be used to inform decisions on the day-to-day running of visiting. IPC mitigations should be adhered to.

Widespread Community Transmission/Increased Severity: While the intention remains that visiting should continue to be facilitated for the benefit of residents, advice on an appropriate response will be issued by the Department of Health and/or Public Health Agency depending on the nature of the disease presenting via community transmission, and its severity both to residents, their visitors and the staff and the wider community.

The expectation is that in all cases, the objective will be, as far as possible, to maintain visiting as described in the “Normal Arrangements” phase of the guidance.
